

“What feelings do dogs have?”, you ask. Well, I know because I have a dog myself. She’s a Labrador retriever and her name is Noodles. She’s a unique dog.

I think dogs have more than enough feelings. Let’s start at the beginning shall we? When Noodles is mad, she growls and chases squirrels. But, some dogs might show it differently like biting, chewing, or barking. When dogs are mad you should observe them so you know when they’re mad.

When Noodles is sad and/or we’re mad at her she hangs her head and slumps herself over into her bed and groans a lot like she’s learned her lesson, other dogs might show this differently like they might hide from you. You might want to look at your dog and see why they’re sad, maybe they lost their favorite chew toy or maybe their doggy girlfriend broke up with them.

When Noodles is excited, she jumps all over the room and one time she got so excited she peed! Your dog might be different maybe they show their excitement by barking or licking. When they’re excited, you can probably tell by their actions or sounds.

When my dog, Noodles, is scared, she gives a shriek or moans or cries, your dog might tell you they’re scared by peeing or getting as small as they can by squatting. When they’re scared, you might want to listen to them because something bad could be happening right now.

You can tell your dog is happy by them jumping around, barking, licking, and sniffing. Noodles shows her happiness by running around in circles. You might want to understand their happiness to see how they act, then, if it’s bad or good, you will know to give them a reward or a punishment.

Noodles is sometimes protective of me because I’m important to her, your dog can be protective of ways like biting, barking, or growling. You probably want to look for these signs because these signs mean they love you.

Lots of dogs show their curiosity differently. Like Noodles licks chairs, tables, boxes, blankets, TV’s, lamps and everything ever created. Some dogs show curiosity differently like some dogs sniff and some dogs leave their sense on things – if you know what I mean! Noodles is also very curious about our pool cleaner. We call our pool cleaner Wiggles because it wiggles all over our pool and Noodles chases and barks at it! Okay, that’s what I know about dog’s feelings!
